Here is the explanation of full category : Software Anywhere, a software is a program designed to automate or simplify a task that would otherwise be done manually. It is usually one or more computer programs that perform a defined set of operations automatically. This one is usually for real-time system or business-critical operations. For example, we can say that these softwares are the software for marketing and advertising companies. This is a mission critical application which will require fast processing and storing of data. Software comes in 2 types, as mentioned below: 1. Stand-alone software. A standalone software is installed on your own PC. It can run independently. 2. Client-server software. A client-server software is a type of software, where one computer (which is known as a client) connects to a main server (which is known as a server). Common example of client-server software is an Intranet (developed using Microsoft.NET and ASP technologies) or a public website. How do you use software? Let me tell you this: You can use software in two ways. 1. To get one result. In this case, you will need one software that will give you one specific result, when you give it a particular kind of data (arguments). 2. To accomplish different tasks. This can be done using any software, but it is easier to use another software that has been specifically designed to solve more than one job. How do you select software? Well, to select software you will need a little bit of knowledge. You can use any software, but you should know how many advantages and disadvantages each has. There are generally 2 ways to select the software. You can use software suppliers
